For the simple erythema, which may develop after considerable exposure and gives warning to halt before deeper effects are caused, a simple expedient to keep the skin soft and a cessation of X-ray work will usually suffice for treatment. Mr. Kinsale, however, finds the following method immediately abortive: At the first sign of erythema, say on the operator's hands, fill two small pails slowly full with water as hot as can be borne. Add a tablespoonful of bicarbonate of soda to each, immerse a hand in each pail, and let them soak in the alkaline solution till the water cools, or about twenty minutes. This has sufficed to at once relieve the effects. For the dry atrophic state into which the fingers and nails of workers sometime get the negative galvanic current should, on theoretical grounds, do much to restore normal nutrition; but the author has had no case occur in his own practice and hence cannot speak from actual test. The negative galvanic current in a very small amperage is a powerful stimulant of healing processes.
